Adamstown Log House
Adamstown
Private

Circa 1830

The Adamstown Log House is a two story log structure. The entire building has been stripped of its clapboard sheathing and the original flank gable roof has been removed. Part of a boxed cornice extends along the front of the building at the roofline.

The logs are laid in a typical horizontal pattern, approximately seven to ten inches apart and joined in each corner with German joints. In between the large beams which make up the wall fabric of the building are smaller wood beams, most of which appear to have been taken from another structure as indicated by notches and grooves.

The Adamstown Log House, having been moved and altered several times, is significant only as an example of a two story log structure with one room on each level. Most log residences in Frederick County have at least two rooms on each level. It is possible the building was originally used as an outbuilding, however most log outbuildings in the county are only one story high. Because the original location of the building is unknown, the builder and function of the structure cannot be determined.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Adamstown Log House is a two story log structure which faces north from the south side of Adamstown Road in Adamstown.

The principal facade is two bays wide. The main entrance which has been removed is framed by plain architrave molding as is the window frame located in the first bay.

Two window frames occupy both bays on the second level of the building. Framing around these windows has been removed or replaced.

Two window frames are located on each level on the rear (south) elevation of the building. Remnants of the mullions supporting double hung 6/6 windows are located in each bay of the rear elevation.

The entire building has been stripped of its clapboard sheathing and the original flank gable roof has been removed. Part of a boxed cornice extends along the front of the building at the roofline.

The logs are laid in a typical horizontal pattern, approximately seven to ten inches apart and joined in each corner with German joints. In between the large beams which make up the wall fabric of the building are smaller wood beams, most of which appear to have been taken from another structure as indicated by notches and grooves.

The joints supporting the second level are rough cut circular sawn two by four beams extending ninety degrees to the front and rear elevation.

The floor plan consists of two approximately nine foot by twelve foot rooms, one on each level with an opening in the east center to second level. The first level consists of a dirt floor. No chimney or fireplace is located in the building.

This log structure originally moved from an undetermined location in Adamstown apparently was used as an outbuilding and converted to a residence.
